Excerpt: . . . yOM her corner by the attic-window, ll Alice saw Dr. Canning leave the house. N, J The sun had gone down; the night was closing in. Away under the eaves queer shadows began to gather. There stood the cradle in which Cyril and his sister had been rocked. Alice could remember its being brought downstairs when she had scarlet fever. She was but three years old then. Oh, I wish I was but three years old now! she sighed to herself. I wish I was that robin pecking around down there on the roof of the piazza! Then she remembered that her Sabbath-school teacher nad told her that it was wrong to wish to change places with any creature without a soul. Then she said to herself, I hope God will forgive me for the bad thought then. I do believe he will, when I feel so bad. Oh, dear! I wish I dared go downstairs. A childs trouble is very sore trouble indeed. Its soon over, you say. What do you mean by soon An hour of your time is as long as a day to a child. Every year one lives is shorter than the last. A days grief, at ten years old, is a long, long grief. It grew dark. Alice did not see the mouse who peered through a crack, with eyes bright and pink, at her. She heard him though. She was not afraid of mice. Mice, she knew,...
